Getting divorced – the steps involved

In this guide we've used the term 'partner' to describe the person you are separating from. We have also used the terms 'divorce' and 'marriage' in the everyday sense which also covers the ending of same-sex civil partnerships.

Complete petition form

You will need to send the completed form, along with a fee to the court. This is something we can help with if needed.

Court Order

A judge will review the forms sent to court by you and also by your partner. If the judge is satisfied you are entitled to a divorce and is happy with what you've planned for any children, you'll be given a conditional order.

Mediation

Mediation is an optional stage to help you and your partner reach agreement over the arrangements for your children, home and finances.

Financial arrangements

We can help you put together a consent order to record how you agree to distribute your home, money, possession, savings and pension.

Divorce finalised

After a 6-week cooling off period, you can apply for the divorce to be finalised. The court will send you a final order. At this point your marriage is officially ended.

The ground for divorce

To divorce in England and Wales you have to show your marriage or civil partnership has reached the point that it cannot be saved – the official term is “irretrievable breakdown of marriage”.

You do this by showing your circumstances fit one of the following five situations:

1

Adultery

This means your partner has had sex with someone else and as a result you find it intolerable to live with them. You will need to have separated within six months of finding out. If they do not admit the adultery you will have to prove it, and this can be tricky.

Behaviour

This is the most common reason used. You find your partner’s behaviour to be so unreasonable that you should not be expected to continue living with them. You will need to have separated within six months of the behaviour happening.

Examples might include:

- Drinking too much alcohol
- Gambling
- Lack of emotional support
- Wasting money
- Violent behaviour

3

Desertion

Your partner left you, disappearing for at least two years. And you’ve not then lived together again for more than six months.

4

Two years’ separation

You have been living apart for at least two years and you both agree to divorce.

5

Five years’ separation

You have been living apart for five years. Here your partner does not need to agree to getting divorced.

Issues to discuss and try to resolve

If you can, it's a good idea to discuss certain matters regarding your children and finances, to help ease the process of separating for you and your children.

Often help is needed in reaching agreement – using mediation, so this list can also be helpful preparation.

Child related issues:

- 1 Where will the children live as their main home?
- 2 Which of you will live with the children in their main home, with day to day responsibility to look after them?
- 3 How much time will the children spend with their other parent and what will the arrangements be (including hand-overs)?
- 4 What will the arrangements be during school holidays, birthdays, Christmas, holidays abroad and for special occasions?
- 5 What will the arrangements be for any step-children (where only one of you is the biological parent)?
- 6 How often will the children visit or have contact with others such as their grandparents?
- 7 Will any special arrangements (such as supervised contact) be needed to protect the children?
- 8 Will any changes need to be made to where your children go to school?
- 9 How will you both make important decisions about your children's future – such as their education and medical treatment?
- 10 Who will pay what in relation to the children? Do you agree to an assessment by the Child Maintenance Service?
- 11 Are any additional payments needed for children such as to continue private education, to cover special health needs or to cover step-children?

Financial related issues:

- 1 What will happen to your family home? Will it be sold or will one of you continue to live there?
- 2 How will the mortgage or rent be paid whilst everything is sorted out?
- 3 Where will the other live and how can you afford two homes?
- 4 Are there credit cards, overdrafts, debts and loans that will need to be paid off?
- 5 How will your money and savings be sorted out? Do any joint accounts need to be closed or frozen?
- 6 How will all of your other property, vehicles and personal possessions be distributed between you?
- 7 How will pension funds be shared between you both?
- 8 If either of you own a business – how will that be dealt with?

Tips to reduce the upset to your children

Parents separating can be traumatic for children. It may even have come as a surprise to them, especially if you kept any disagreements behind closed doors.

There are steps you can take to reduce the impact on them:

Agree behaviour in front of children

You and your partner should try to agree ground rules for how you will act together to reduce the impact of your separation on your children.

Never criticise your former partner in front of the children

It can be tempting, but is unfair on your children. Children can feel you are criticising them too.

Listen to your children

Listen to how they feel. They could be feeling angry, frightened or worried. They are entitled to be deeply affected by your decision to separate. You should not stop your children talking just because you don't like what you hear.

Ideally choose a time when both you and the children are feeling happy – perhaps when you get home after a successful daytrip. With younger children they may use other ways to express their feelings such as drawings. Ask about the drawings; this can be a good way to start your child talking about their feelings. If it is not possible to do this yourself, speak to your GP about finding a professional counsellor.

Do not use your children as messengers

If you need to speak to your former partner about something, you should do it yourself. Children resent being put in the middle. If it is hard for you to talk face to face, then write a letter or email.

Treat your former partner with respect in front of the children

It will reduce trauma inflicted on your children. They quite naturally want both parents to continue to get on together, even if they accept you cannot live together.

Clearly tell your children you love them

Ideally tell them that you and your former partner both agree on this. Make sure they know they're safe and will always be cared for.

Keep talking to your children during any disputes over money or contact arrangements and beyond. This can make a big difference to your children. This can be even more important as they reach their teens and start to form their own relationships.

Try to both co-operate over issues relating to your children

Disputes will hurt your children. The more co-operative you both are the more the emotional stress will be reduced for everyone.

Try to agree arrangements where both parents remain actively involved

Statistics show that children who continue to have a positive relationship with both parents will have a better start to life, do better at school and stay out of trouble.
